

WestminsterResearch

<http://www.westminster.ac.uk/westminsterresearch>

Symbols, Language, and Identity in Northern Ireland

Breen, P.

This is an author's accepted manuscript of an article published in the ESSE - English Studies in Albania, 5 (1), pp. 9-22 2014. Details of the final, definitive published version are available from:

<http://www.assenglish.org/publications/>

The WestminsterResearch online digital archive at the University of Westminster aims to make the research output of the University available to a wider audience. Copyright and Moral Rights remain with the authors and/or copyright owners.

Whilst further distribution of specific materials from within this archive is forbidden, you may freely distribute the URL of WestminsterResearch: (<http://westminsterresearch.wmin.ac.uk/>).

In case of abuse or copyright appearing without permission e-mail repository@westminster.ac.uk

Citation information. in esse: English Studies in Albania. Volume 5, Issue 1, Page 9-22. ISSN 2078 – 7413.

Symbols, Language, and Identity in Northern Ireland

Paul BREEN, INTO University of East Anglia, London

paulbbreen@hotmail.com

Abstract

Like a number of divided societies in the contemporary era, Northern Ireland has found it difficult to reconcile differences in the use of symbols, language, and other artefacts of identity, in its movement towards the creation of a stable, post-conflict national state. Historically, Northern Ireland has been socially and politically divided between Protestant Unionists who see themselves as British and Roman Catholic Nationalists who predominantly aspire to Irish unity. Even today, when there is relative peace, following violence that lasted three decades, there is still division between these two communities; each one having their own flags, symbols, sporting allegiances, and national or cultural folklore, which some might see as irreconcilable. This paper then asks the question of whether two such opposing forces can ever be reconciled, and if the two parts of this divided society can come together as one, finding a means of tolerating, if not quite accepting, the symbols of the other, and managing to transcend the idea of communal ownership of such symbols. It goes on to assess the viewpoint that such reconciliation can only occur when the symbols of the two sides are given equal status and legitimacy in the 'language' of the State itself, and finds positive voices in the literature to support this stance, drawing on socio-cultural and feminist theory to also re-examine the whole concept of a 'nation state' in itself.

Keywords: Northern Ireland, national identity, conflict resolution, reconciliation